Monthly Commentary

Bond markets. June turned out to be a volatile but generally positive month for bond markets. We still believe that the trend towards lower yields has a good chance of continuing, however, the market situation is still more suitable for a tactical duration management than to an outright long positions. The reason is the still existing risks. We believe that the chances of a new wave of inflation have decreased: a possible acceleration in price growth due to raw materials is likely to be offset by a slowdown in the services sector. A new risk factor is the possible election of Donald Trump. The risk in the event of Trump's election lies in tax cuts in the United States, which will further worsen the situation with the country's budget deficit. We consider this factor to be moderately important. If Trump wins, he will certainly try to reduce taxes, but 1) this trick is already known to the market after his first election in 2016 (the market usually reacts weaker to each repetition of an already known risk), 2) the scale of tax cuts will be moderate. We believe that the continued deterioration of the US macro data (consumer sector, labor market) will be a most important factor in favor of lower yields.

Portfolio. We intend to maintain a longer portfolio duration ( $\pm 10$ ) with a focus on tactical position management, despite the increasing case for lower yields due to the gradual deterioration of the US economy. In the current situation, we consider long-term US government bonds to be the most attractive investment option in the fixed income universe. Spreads on corporate bonds remain narrow — it generally eliminates chances for excess price appreciation, but still contains risks in case of recession in the US. We also see some tactical opportunities in European government bonds, whose yields, in our view, will inevitably decline following that of US Treasuries.
