Monthly Commentary

Bond Markets. The bond market decline continued until the U.S. elections. Donald Trump's win marked a turning point: the market anticipates that the new administration may significantly worsen the U.S. national debt situation. However, it is worth noting that some of Trump's recent initiatives (such as the Department of Government Efficiency, DOGE, with Elon Musk's involvement) do not appear all that negative for U.S. credit quality. Also, Trump's stance on increasing domestic oil production could potentially slow inflation. Macroeconomic factors seem relatively favorable for bonds. For instance, at its November meeting, the Federal Reserve continued to lower interest rates. October's labor market data was also weak, largely due to hurricanes and Boeing strikes. Inflation for October remained stable, indicating no risk of a second wave of price increases. One of the main risks remains the imposition of new tariffs against key U.S. trading partners, which could drive up prices. However, during Trump's first term, the start of the trade war (summer 2018) almost entirely coincided with the peak in government bond yields. This time, the impact of tariffs may be even smaller.

Portfolio. We believe that the main market movement triggered by Donald Trump's election as U.S. President has already occurred. The yield on 10-year U.S. Treasuries has increased by 80 basis points since mid-September (following the Federal Reserve's decision), making long-term bonds more attractive for purchase. We plan to maintain the portfolio's duration at the benchmark level or above. Conversely, credit spreads on corporate bonds have fallen to a 10-year low, which keeps this market segment less appealing. We continue to utilize selective tactical ideas, such as bonds from Intel or the French group ELO (formerly Auchan).
